This report was written by Eric Rosenthal with the invaluable assistance of Carol Smoller. The report was edited by Barbara Frey, Sarah DeCosse and Dan Gerdts. The fact-finding team to Chiapas in May 1993 included Dan Gerdts, Sarah DeCosse, Rachel Kaplan, and Eric Rosenthal. Alicia Ely-Yamin translated for Eric Rosenthal and assisted in planning the fact finding mission in November-December 1992. The following persons contributed to this report by assisting with translation, editing, or research: Coleen Beebe, Cynthia Breslauer, Barbara Plantiko, Kristie Evenson, Joe Hohenstein, Andrew Painter, Andrés Sanfuentes, Carol Smoller, Sheila Starkey, Linda Stone, Kimberly Wick, and Vanessa Williams. In Mexico, thanks to the entire staff of the following human rights and church groups for their assistance and support on this project: the Comisión de Solidaridad y Defensa de Los Derechos Humanos, A.C. in Chihuahua (including former counsel María Teresa Jardí), the Hermanas Carmelitas del Sagrado Corazón, the Comisión Mexicana de Defensa y Promoción de los Derechos Humanos, A.C. in Mexico City, the Centro de Derechos Humanos Fray Bartolomé de las Casas in Chiapas. Special thanks to the many people in Mexico who offered their valuable insights, tremendous energy and commitment, and warm hospitality to the Minnesota Advocates investigators working on this project.

EDITOR'S PREFACE

For most of this century, Mexico has been spared the degree of military intervention in domestic affairs that has afflicted most Latin American countries. There has been no coup d'état since the Mexican Revolution, and the last president to emerge from the ranks of the armed forces left office in 1946.

This is no accident. The disastrous effects of military rule in the 19th and early 20th centuries created a consensus that led to a constitutional prohibition of military involvement in domestic affairs. Article 129 of the Constitution specifies that "in time of peace, no military authority may exercise any functions other than those precisely related to military discipline."

To be sure, this prohibition has not always been respected, especially by Mexican presidents worried about losing their grip on power. In 1968, President Gustavo Díaz Ordaz ordered the army to suppress student demonstrators who were demanding a greater measure of democracy. Troops using tanks and automatic weapons attacked a large but peaceful gathering of students in Mexico City's Tlatelolco Plaza, killing several hundred. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the military's brigadas blancas (white brigades) carried out "disappearances" of suspected dissidents in the cities, while the army waged a brutal counterinsurgency campaign in the rural state of Guerrero that made little distinction between combatants and civilians. Yet once the perceived threat to Mexico's political system subsided in the mid-1970s, so (for the most part) did the abuses under the presidencies of José López Portillo (1976-1982) and Miguel de la Madrid Hurtado (1982-1988).

It is therefore troubling to observe signs of renewed involvement of the military in civilian affairs during the administration of President Carlos Salinas de Gortari (1988-1994). That involvement began shortly after the new president's inauguration, and initially was aimed at reinforcing the strict controls over labor and elections by which the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) has held a monopoly of power in Mexico for 64 years. In January 1989, President Salinas dispatched army units to Ciudad Madero in the northern state of Tamaulipas to arrest Oil Workers Union leader Joaquín Hernández Galicia ("La Quina"), who had broken ranks with the PRI by quietly supporting opposition leader Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas in the 1988 presidential election. In August 1989, the president sent five thousand troops to take over the Cananea copper mine in the northwestern state of Sonora; the preemptive seizure broke the back of the union as the government prepared to sell the mine to private investors.¹ In April 1990, Salinas ordered columns of tanks and armored personnel carriers into the central state of Michoacán (a Cárdenas stronghold) to dislodge citizens who had occupied town halls to protest fraud in state and municipal elections.²

More recently, the Salinas administration has been increasing its reliance on the military in its anti-narcotics campaign. The militarization of the drug war is, in large measure, a result of the government's inability or unwillingness

1. The mine was sold to Jorge Larrea, a close friend of President Salinas.

2. "Militares y judiciales, juntos, evacuaron las alcaldías en Michoacán," Proceso, April 9, 1990, pp. 6-11.

to pursue serious reform of the police. The Federal Judicial Police, Mexico's counterpart to the FBI, has become doubly discredited by revelations that many of its top commanders have been working for the drug cartels, and by a pattern of serious human rights violations exposed by Mexican and international human rights organizations. Two earlier reports published by the North America Project -- Justice Corrupted, Justice Denied (Nov. 1992) and Six Months After the U.N. Verdict (May 1993) -- documented the continuing pattern of impunity for abuses of human rights by officials of the Federal Judicial Police.

There is by now reason to question the effectiveness of the military in its new assignment, particularly since there are indications the drug cartels have purchased influence there as well. One sign of that influence surfaced with the killing of seven Federal Judicial Police agents by an army unit at Tlalixcoyan, Veracruz, on November 7, 1991. The agents were in hot pursuit of a small plane laden with cocaine from Colombia. When the police plane landed at the clandestine airstrip after radioing its intentions to the military, its occupants were gunned down by soldiers as the drug traffickers escaped. Despite the presence of a refueling truck and the fact that two of the dead agents had been shot in the back, and one had powder burns in the mouth, the government persisted in presenting the incident as a case of confusion and mistaken identity.³ Though a public outcry eventually led to the arrest of the commanding general on charges of homicide, the government avoided blaming the military for the massacre, and did not pursue the trail of evidence suggesting the army unit may have been preparing to refuel the smugglers' plane, and fired on the police to cover the smugglers' escape.⁴

Another disturbing development is the deployment of the army among the indigenous populations of southern Mexico -- especially in Chiapas -- where long-simmering land conflicts have been aggravated by the government's agrarian policy. In December 1991, President Salinas amended the Constitution, terminating the redistribution of land initiated after the Mexican Revolution, and allowing communal landholdings known as ejidos to be subdivided and sold. This policy has been resisted by communities of indigenous origin for two reasons. First, because it violates a centuries'-old tradition of communal landholding. And second, because these communities already felt betrayed by the government's unwillingness to enforce agrarian reform titles assigned to them many years ago, but held up by powerful landholders with close ties to the government. Symbolizing those close ties is Patrocinio González Garrido, who, as governor of Chiapas, developed a reputation for ruthlessness by imprisoning hundreds of members of indigenous communities, as well as federal employees and priests who have supported their cause.⁵ In January of this year, President Salinas appeared to signal an intensification of hard-line policies in rural Mexico with the appointment of González Garrido as Secretary of Government, the federal cabinet post in charge of maintaining internal order.

The effect of these policies on human rights in rural Mexico is meticulously documented in the following report prepared by Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights. Based in Minneapolis, Minnesota Advocates has devoted special attention to Mexico, in recognition of growing ties with that country as its economy gradually becomes integrated with those of the United States and Canada. In previous reports, Minnesota Advocates has documented the routine use of torture in criminal investigations, as well as the use of covert agents (madrinas) by the police. In its last report, Minnesota Advocates argued the need for an independent system of human rights enforcement, and called on both Mexico and the United States to participate fully in the inter-American system of human rights.

After years of working in Mexico in collaboration with domestic human rights organizations, and extensive field work in Chiapas and Chihuahua in preparation for this report, Minnesota Advocates has established itself as one of the foremost authorities on the subject of human rights in Mexico. In the ensuing report, that expertise is manifest both in the thoroughness of the analysis and in the compelling logic of the conclusions and recommendations.

Underscoring the urgency of the proposed reforms is a late-breaking report of extrajudicial executions by the military in Chihuahua. According to witnesses, a unit of the "Marte" Task Force based in Badiraguato, Sinaloa, executed five men they had detained on an airstrip at Ciénega Prieta, Chihuahua, on June 23, 1993. The men had apparently been tortured for more than an hour before being shot, and their bodies were covered with bayonet wounds.⁶

Significantly, this is the first report by a human rights organization to focus on human rights abuses by the Mexican military. In so doing, it breaks Mexico's taboo on criticism of the military, second only to the taboo on criticism of the president and the presidency. If Mexico is truly to modernize and develop the vibrant civil society essential to the fulfillment of human rights, such taboos will have to be broken for good, so that no person or sector of society is beyond criticism -- and beyond the reach of the law.

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

This report documents human rights abuses by the Mexican military and police in rural areas inhabited by people of indigenous ancestry. It is the product of a seven-month study by Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights¹ that included on-site investigations in the Mexican states of Chihuahua in November 1992 and Chiápas in May 1993, as well as meetings with the Mexican National Human Rights Commission and with military officials.

The report documents a series of incidents that took place in the Mexican states of Chihuahua in autumn 1992 and Chiápas in spring 1993. In the week of October 26, 1992, following the killing of a soldier near Baborigame, Chihuahua, at least 25 soldiers engaged in a week-long campaign of arbitrary detention, beatings, and torture against indigenous Tepehuan residents.

In Chiápas, on March 28-29, 1993, following the disappearance and presumed killing of two soldiers, approximately 400 soldiers and a handful of police arbitrarily detained, searched, and beat civilians in two Tzotzil villages. Police tortured a number of those detained. On April 25, about 200 police returned to the same village, searched and looted homes, and again interrogated and tortured villagers. On May 8, some 400 police in at least 47 vehicles returned to the village, only to find it had been deserted. When the Minnesota Advocates' fact-finding team visited the village of San Isidro on May 25, it was still entirely deserted.

This report also documents a third incident that occurred while the Minnesota Advocates' fact-finding team was in Chiápas. On May 24, 500 to 1000 soldiers detained the entire Tzeltal population of Pataté Viejo for two hours while they conducted house-to-house searches. Villagers reported to Minnesota Advocates that eight unarmed residents were taken by the soldiers. These eight Mexicans were originally charged with possession of illegal weapons. The military subsequently claimed the detainees were arrested, while armed, fleeing from the scene of a shootout with soldiers. The military never contested that the detentions took place at least a full day after the alleged shootout. Several witnesses have contested the military version of events, saying the detainees were not armed when arrested, but were taken from their homes and work places in a military sweep of the Pataté community. Given the suspicious circumstances of their detention, Minnesota Advocates calls for the release of the detainees unless the authorities come forward with credible evidence against them.

1. Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights, founded in 1983, is a nongovernmental organization of one thousand members that works to promote and protect international human rights. Given the close and growing connection between the countries of North America, Minnesota Advocates is particularly committed to documenting human rights conditions in Mexico. An overview of recent human rights issues in Mexico is included in the most recent Minnesota Advocates report, No Double Standards in International Law: Linkage of NAFTA with hemispheric system of human rights enforcement is needed -- Canada, Mexico, and the United States must become full partners in the Inter-American System of Human Rights (December 1992) [hereinafter No Double Standards].

Whether or not the military account of events in Ocosingo is correct, the detention of villagers and search of homes in Pataté was clearly illegal. The Mexican Constitution prohibits the military from any form of law enforcement involving the search of homes or detention of civilians.

Minnesota Advocates finds that lawless practices of the Mexican military have become increasingly tolerated at the highest levels of Mexican government. To date, there has been no official reprimand of the illegal military detentions in San Isidro or Ocosingo, let alone prosecution for criminal wrongdoing. Moreover, statements by the Secretary of Defense suggest that house-to-house searches of whole villages and the mass detention of civilians is now the officially sanctioned response to the threat of guerrilla activity.

The growing acceptance of lawless military involvement in detentions and searches among civilian populations is a dangerous development. This is especially true for people of indigenous ancestry,² because the power of the Mexican military is particularly pronounced in the rural areas where their numbers are greatest. As documented by Minnesota Advocates in the past, indigenous people in remote areas are often singled out for discrimination and abuse.³ Violent land conflicts often pit these poor farmers against powerful landholders, and the authorities frequently side with the latter.⁴ Indigenous people are particularly vulnerable to such abuse because they are poor and politically powerless, and have few independent institutions to defend their rights. Many indigenous people speak their native language rather than Spanish, and are cut off by lack of electricity or telephone links. When abuses occur, the authorities can usually count on word of the abuses not spreading.

In each of the incidents described, the stated reason for military action against civilians was that soldiers were investigating the killing of other soldiers. The military's official objectives -- monitoring drug trafficking, destroying drug crops, searching for guerrillas along the border with Guatemala -- are inherently dangerous and may lead to soldiers being fired upon or killed. Violence of this kind does not justify the suspension of the rights of civilians under international human rights law or under the Mexican Constitution. So long as the military is allowed to conduct arbitrary detentions of civilians and operate outside the bounds of Mexican law, operations in these remote regions pose a serious danger to the rights of the civilian population.

2. People of indigenous ancestry are descendants of the population that inhabited Mexico before the European conquest. Many indigenous people have intermarried and become assimilated with descendants of the Europeans. These people of mixed ethnic ancestry are known as mestizos. An estimated nine percent of the Mexican population (about seven million persons) have not assimilated, however, and still speak their own indigenous languages. Instituto Nacional Indigenista, Programa Nacional de Desarrollo de los Pueblos Indios 1991-1994, 11 (1991). The ethnic groups represented in this report are the Tepehuan of southwestern Chihuahua and the Tzotzil and Tzeltal of Chiapas.

3. Conquest Continued: Disregard for Human and Indigenous Rights in the Mexican State of Chiapas, 1 (1992) (hereinafter Conquest Continued).

4. See discussion infra, p. 21.

In addition to these new findings regarding the military, this report also confirms a pattern of abuses already well documented by the United States Department of State,⁵ the United Nations Committee Against Torture,⁶ Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights,⁷ and other non-governmental human rights organizations:⁸ that the Mexican police engage in the systematic use of torture, and that a "culture of impunity" allows documented human rights abusers to go unpunished. Despite credible allegations by human rights groups of torture by soldiers in the region of Baborigame and police in the region of San Isidro, there has not to date been a single prosecution for torture in any of the cases documented in this report.

The Mexican government's National Commission on Human Rights (Comisión Nacional de Derechos Humanos or CNDH) has largely failed in its constitutionally mandated role as a check on official authority in the cases documented in this report. In Baborigame and San Isidro, the CNDH was presented with evidence of torture but did not call for its prosecution. The CNDH has shown particular deference to the military, absolving it of any wrongdoing in San Isidro despite the presence of hundreds of soldiers as abuses took place, and evidence suggesting their active involvement in detentions, interrogations, beatings, and other acts of intimidation.

The CNDH has also contributed to the hostile climate for independent human rights monitoring by repeating apparently unfounded military allegations that the Chiapas-based human rights group, the Centro de Derechos Humanos Fray Bartolomé de las Casas, coached witnesses to fabricate testimony. The CNDH also suggests the Centro is to blame for the illegal delay in the release of detainees from San Isidro by the Public Prosecutor. Minnesota Advocates' independent investigation corroborates many of the claims made by the Centro and finds the work of the organization generally thorough and responsible.

5. "[T]here continue to be human rights abuses in Mexico, many of which go unpunished, owing to the culture of impunity that has traditionally surrounded human rights violators. These violations include the use of torture and other abuses by elements of the security forces. . . ." 7. Minnesota Advocates has published the following reports on abuses by Mexican law enforcement officials: The Homicide of Dr. Victor Manuel Oropeza Contreras: A Case Study of Failed Human Rights Reforms in Mexico (1991) [hereinafter Oropeza Report]; and Paper Protection: Human Rights Violations and the Mexican Criminal Justice System (1990). In an overview report on human rights conditions in Chiapas, abuses by law enforcement officials were also found to be significant. Conquest Continued, supra note 3, at 8.

Méndez, Executive Director, Americas Watch; Amnesty International, Mexico: The persistence of torture and impunity (June 1993); Red Nacional de Organismos Civiles de Derechos Humanos, La Impunidad Persistente (April 1993).

Minnesota Advocates calls on the military and the CNDH to issue public statements substantiating or retracting their allegations against this human rights organization.

The cases documented in this report demonstrate a fundamental lack of respect for the rule of law on the part of the Mexican military and police. The Mexican Constitution provides safeguards that would ensure the protection of international human rights -- if Mexican law were enforced. High level official tolerance for lawlessness on the part of the military and police demonstrates the need for a more fundamental commitment to the protection and enforcement of human rights at all levels of the Mexican government, the military, and the criminal justice system.

II. FINDINGS⁹

Chihuahua, Autumn 1992

On October 17, 1992, 2nd Lt. Miguel Angel García Bautista, of the infantry unit Force Tarea Marte XX based in Baborigame, was shot dead. According to military authorities, the unit was taking part in a campaign against drug traffickers in the region of Baborigame, in the southwest corner of the Mexican state of Chihuahua, and García Bautista was killed in the line of duty.¹⁰ The military's prime suspect was Juan Chaparro Carrillo, an indigenous Tepehuan man allegedly found guarding a marijuana field. Chaparro Carrillo evaded capture and has never been brought to trial.

Following the murder of Lieutenant García, soldiers from Force Tarea Marte XX went on a rampage against the Tepehuan residents of six villages and isolated homes in the area around Baborigame. According to an official report submitted to the State Attorney General's Office of Chihuahua,¹¹ a report by the Chihuahua-based human rights group COSYDDHAC,¹² and a report by the CNDH,¹³ about 40 soldiers were engaged in a search for Chaparro Carrillo during which they interrogated, beat, and mistreated scores of Tepehuan villagers, arbitrarily detained residents, and destroyed at least seven homes.

From December 2-5, 1992, Eric Rosenthal, a representative of Minnesota Advocates, visited three of the affected villages and interviewed 16 victims of abuse, as well as local religious leaders, the commander of the military force in Baborigame, General Ricardo Maldonado, and the commander of a military force based in Sinaloa, General Elisalde. While Rosenthal was in the region, the army apologized for the incidents and offered to provide aid to those who had suffered abuse.¹⁴ On December 3, Rosenthal witnessed the first stage of the military distribution of aid and met with General Javier del Real, chief of the military delegation sent from Mexico City.

The factual findings of the Minnesota Advocates investigation are consistent with those of COSYDDHAC.¹⁵ Minnesota Advocates finds that at least 25 soldiers engaged in a week-long campaign of arbitrary detention, beatings, and torture. Minnesota Advocates also corroborates allegations that there was an initial military attempt to disrupt the gathering of evidence by human rights organizations and to intimidate witnesses.

Baborigame Incidents

The first incidents of abuse reported to Minnesota Advocates took place on October 26, 1992, in the village of Arroyo de la Huerta.¹⁶ Miguel Chaparro (the suspect's brother) and his family were sleeping outside when 10 to 25 soldiers arrived. Miguel Chaparro and two other men were kicked and beaten with rifle butts as they were interrogated about the whereabouts of Juan Chaparro. Two of the men, Miguel Chaparro and Alejandro Quiñones, suffered serious injuries.¹⁷ Three men and three boys were detained in army barracks overnight and interrogated. Two of the boys said they were tortured by Memo to the State Attorney General.

17. Miguel Chaparro reported to Minnesota Advocates that he suffered broken ribs, and Alejandro Quiñones reported he suffered a crushed windpipe. At the time of the interview with Minnesota Advocates on December 2, Quiñones was still unable to speak above a whisper, a condition he suffered since the incident. soldiers who forced alcohol up their noses.¹⁸

When Miguel Chaparro returned home after his release from detention, he found his home had been burned down and all his possessions destroyed. His cow pens had been opened, and the escaping cattle destroyed his entire crop of corn. Chaparro said several other homes were also destroyed.¹⁹

About 25 soldiers arrived in the village of Palos Muertos early in the morning of October 27 and ransacked several homes. Residents said soldiers stole money and destroyed household items. An elderly man, Juan Rivas, was humiliated by being forced to strip in front of the villagers. Twenty-five men were detained in a school for about four hours, and at least ten were beaten. They were interrogated about Chaparro Carrillo and the location of marijuana and poppy fields. As the men were being interrogated in the school, some women were beaten by soldiers in the village as the soldiers searched homes.²⁰

On October 28, forty soldiers arrived in the village of Algarrobos.²¹ Family members and neighbors of Chaparro Carrillo were detained in two small houses for over a week. One woman, Refugio Quiñones Carrillo, said she was held for eight days with her hands tied behind her back. Her husband was away when the soldiers arrived, so her six children were left under the sole supervision of her eldest daughter, age eleven.

The wife of suspect Refugio Zaldaña Carrillo said four individuals were also detained, tied, and held face down on the floor.²² She reported that soldiers said they would kill ten villagers to avenge the lieutenant's killing.²³

Minnesota Advocates also interviewed one family whose home was 18. Minnesota Advocates interviewed Miguel Chaparro's son Benjamín, age 15, who reported abuse by the soldiers. Benjamín reported that as he was being interrogated, a soldier ran a knife across his back and then made him place his hands on a wooden table as a soldier stabbed the knife into the table between his fingers. Benjamín also said the soldiers forced alcohol up his nose.

19. Miguel Chaparro told Minnesota Advocates that six houses were burned down. A COSYDDHAC delegation found two burned homes. COSYDDHAC, supra note 12, at 6.

20. One woman, Loretta Rivas Vega, reported she was beaten when she could not understand a soldier's Spanish. As she told Minnesota Advocates: "At one point the soldiers came in and hit me with a rifle in the rib just because I did not understand what they were saying to me. This happened the same day as everyone else was beaten, October 27."

destroyed with no apparent connection to the search for Chaparro Carrillo.²⁴ Francisco Zuñiga and Jesusa Navarrete Carrillo (unrelated to Chaparro Carrillo), said their home in the area of Santa Rosa was destroyed in their absence. According to Zuñiga and Navarrete, all their possessions were destroyed, including corn and bean crops, several cows, and 20 chickens. At the time of the interview, the two would not return to their land for fear of the soldiers.

Initial Military Efforts to Impede the Investigation

General Luis Montiel López, commander of the 5th Military Zone, responded to the initial allegations²⁵ of abuse in October 1992 by denying their veracity, and he reportedly claimed to be collecting affidavits from local residents to the effect that no abuses had occurred.²⁶ On November 23, COSYDDHAC responded by gathering an assembly of some two hundred local residents to substantiate its allegations.

Minnesota Advocates interviewed witnesses who said soldiers threatened and intimidated them to prevent them from reporting abuses at the November 23 assembly. Miguel Chaparro was warned immediately after his release from detention that the soldiers would "come back for me" if he told anyone about his detention or beating. Three villagers from Palos Muertos said they were stopped by soldiers on the way to the November 23 assembly and questioned. Loretto Carrillo Palma and Antonio Rivas independently stated they were stopped on the way to the assembly and given statements to sign denying any abuses occurred. Carrillo said the soldiers tried to coerce him into signing. Rivas said when he refused to sign, the soldiers suggested he was growing marijuana.

Jesusa Navarrete Carrillo also said the army tried to make her confess to growing drugs and to acknowledge that her house was used to dry marijuana. Allegations she insisted were untrue. She said when she returned home she found her house destroyed and marijuana scattered over the burned fields around her home. Upon arriving at the assembly on November 23, soldiers presented her with photographs of the marijuana by her home and asked her to sign a statement acknowledging it was hers. She refused. According to Sister Leovigilda López, the photograph showed stalks of marijuana standing beside her house in a way that did not seem authentic. The military denied a reporter's request to take a picture of the photo.

The military attempted to disrupt the November 23 assembly, according to

24. According to the CNDH, this house was burned down on October 19, 1992, two days after the killing of García Bautista.

25. The first allegations of abuse by the military were collected in October 1992 by Father P. Francisco Chávez, a parish priest, and Sister Leovigilda López, mother superior of the Hermanas Carmelitas del Sagrado Corazón Convent, based in Baborigame. These allegations were corroborated by representatives of COSYDDHAC and by an agent of the Public Prosecutor of the region sent to investigate the killing of 2nd Lt. García Bautista. COSYDDHAC, by objecting to the public format and insisting that witnesses speak in Spanish, rather than in their native Tepehuan.²⁷ In addition, military representatives reportedly harassed speakers and mocked their testimonies.²⁸ An army photographer was present and took photographs of each speaker,²⁹ adding to the fear of future reprisals on the part of those who spoke out.

After the November 23 assembly, Sister Leovigilda López, who reported the original allegations for COSYDDHAC, told Minnesota Advocates she was verbally accosted by soldiers who accused her of "aiding drug traffickers."

After meeting with COSYDDHAC legal counsel Teresa Jardí on November 29, the Mexican Department of Defense for the first time reversed the position of outright denial taken by General Montiel. The Department of Defense issued a press release stating it would investigate allegations of abuse and that violations of human rights would be "punished to the full extent of the law."³⁰

Prosecution of Soldiers

As described above, Minnesota Advocates found that at least 25 soldiers engaged in the arbitrary detention of villagers and destruction of homes. Minnesota Advocates interviewed two men who were severely beaten during interrogations by soldiers and one boy who had water forced up his nose -- behavior that constitutes torture under international human rights law.³¹

The soldiers involved in these abuses have not all been prosecuted. The CNDH has reported that four soldiers were to be prosecuted in a military court for crimes of "devastation, breaking and entering homes, and violence against people causing vexation."³² None of the soldiers were charged with torture.

27. Military Attorney Jesús Gerardo Tovar Medina objected to the collection of evidence in a public gathering, according to COSYDDHAC, arguing it should be collected individually so speakers would be unable to make up corroborating testimony. He also demanded that testimony be presented in Spanish rather than Tepehuan. Teresa Jardí, attorney for COSYDDHAC, answered that the event was organized by COSYDDHAC to substantiate its allegations. She pointed out that even if this were a formal judicial proceeding, Article 4 of the Mexican Constitution would protect the right of everyone to testify in their own language and to have an interpreter present. Minnesota Advocates has been unable to determine whether the cases against the four soldiers reported by the CNDH actually went forward or whether there have been any convictions.³³ Neither the Department of Defense nor the CNDH have responded to inquiries about the status of the prosecutions.

Military Provision of Aid to Affected Villagers

Secretary of Defense Antonio Riviello Bazán announced in the last week of November 1992 that the army would provide aid to the villagers against whom abuses occurred.³⁴ General Javier del Real visited Baborigame on December 3, and Minnesota Advocates witnessed the distribution of aid.³⁵

Since December 1992, the military has instituted an economic development program for the area of Baborigame, and has provided building materials and architectural plans to begin the reconstruction of the homes destroyed in the actions of October 1992.³⁶ Local advocates have reported that the development program has had a positive effect on the Tepehuan communities in the area, and they have expressed hope the aid would continue.

While the distribution of aid by the army is important, there has been no official recognition of a right to compensation for those who suffered loss. As it made payments on December 3 to those who lost their homes, the army created the impression it was distributing aid, rather than providing compensation for loss or mistreatment to which the recipients may have had a right. In a speech he gave at each village, General del Real said the aid was a "gift from the Secretary of Defense in Mexico City." The general also told a reporter that the Father Chávez identified 83 families in the affected villages to receive food, clothing, and blankets. Minnesota Advocates observed the December 3 distribution of aid to residents of the villages of La Quebrada, Los Algarrobos, and Palos Muertos, and witnessed distribution of cash payments equivalent to 1000 new pesos (approximately $330) to three families whose homes had been destroyed.

36. Letter from COSYDDHAC (June 16, 1993). On January 9, Secretary of Defense Bazán visited the region and oversaw delivery of additional provisions and clothing and the equivalent of 2,000 new pesos to each of the families whose home was destroyed. Bazán told those who lost their homes that the military could not provide them with the 10,000 new pesos they had requested to make up their losses, but he promised additional aid.

distribution of aid did not constitute any admission of wrongdoing.³⁷

None of those interviewed by Minnesota Advocates reported they had been informed of any legal rights they may have had, nor did the military make any individualized determinations of loss as it distributed aid.³⁸

Chiápas, Spring 1993

The following is an account taken primarily from interviews by a Minnesota Advocates fact-finding team that visited Chiápas on May 21-25, 1993. The Minnesota Advocates team also reviewed videotaped interviews with victims of abuse in San Isidro taken by the San Cristóbal-based human rights organization, Centro de Derechos Humanos Fray Bartolomé de las Casas (the "Centro Fray Bartolomé"), as well as videotaped interviews taken by the CNDH regarding the first incidents on March 28-29, 1992.³⁹ The videotaped interviews provide background and confirm the general findings of the independent Minnesota Advocates' investigation.

San Isidro Incidents

In a remarkable replay of the events in Chihuahua, the abuses in and around the village of San Isidro were sparked by the presumed killing of two soldiers. On May 20, 1993, Air Force Captain Marco Antonio Romero Villalba and Infantry Lieutenant Porfirio Millán Pimentel disappeared as they were traveling, off-duty, in the region of San Isidro el Ocotál. According to military sources, soldiers from the 31st zone of the 7th Military Region fanned through the area to undertake "intensive reconnaissance" in search of the missing soldiers.⁴⁰ San Isidro residents estimated that some 500 soldiers camped in and around the village of San Isidro for eight days.⁴¹

37. Rosa Rojas, "In the case of Baborigame, still no indictment of those responsible for abuses," La Jornada, December 7, 1992.

38. On December 3, 1992, Minnesota Advocates interviewed three aid recipients whose homes had been destroyed: Miguel Chaparro, his wife Paula, and Jesusa Navarette. They said payments received as of that time would not fully compensate the loss of their homes and possessions. None of the recipients interviewed reported having been told that any more money might be available if the compensation was insufficient. Indeed, all three expressed considerable fear of the military and said they would be afraid to ask for more.

41. Interview with Mariano de la Cruz López and Alberto Shilón (May 25, 1993). According to de la Cruz and Shilón, the soldiers camped in and around the village from May 22 to May 28. The Commander of the 7th Military Region, General Miguel Angel Godínez Bravo, confirmed that soldiers under his command conducted this investigation, but he stated that his soldiers never camped in the village of San Isidro. Interview with General Godínez (May 25, 1993).

On May 28, severely charred remains were found near the village of San Isidro. Military authorities announced they had found remains of the two soldiers, though the official autopsy later stated the bodies were destroyed beyond recognition.⁴²

March 28-30 Incidents: Summary of Findings

The Centro Fray Bartolomé and the CNDH accounts of the events that followed on March 28-30 differ substantially. According to the Centro, the army was directly involved in the detentions that followed, as well as in beatings and torture.⁴³ The CNDH report agrees with the Centro Fray Bartolomé that the warrantless searches and prolonged detentions were illegal.⁴⁴ The CNDH finds the Judicial Police were entirely responsible for these detentions, however, and absolves the army of any responsibility. The CNDH received reports of military participation in the detention and beatings, but it concluded the evidence was insufficient to call for their prosecution.⁴⁵

42. Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights obtained a copy of the autopsy report on these remains from the CNDH. The report was reviewed by Lindsey Thomas, Assistant Medical Examiner for Hennepin County, Minnesota. According to Dr. Thomas, the autopsy report generally presents the available evidence thoroughly and professionally. The report finds that the bones were human and belonged to two persons, one large and "corpulent," the other small. At minimum, the report disproves a claim by one of the residents of San Isidro that the bones were remains of his dog. Because of destruction by fire of soft tissue, bones, and even teeth, however, the forensic pathologists conducting the autopsy were unable to positively identify the remains as those of the missing soldiers. The report concludes these were the remains of the missing soldiers, but the only link to the soldiers is a gold ring inscribed "Josephine," the name of the wife of one of the soldiers. This ring was said to have been found with the remains, but there is no independent corroboration.

45. The CNDH reviewed a number of declarations made by the detainees to the Public Prosecutor, and conducted an additional three interviews with the detainees. Among the nine declarations, the majority stated that soldiers were directly involved in the detentions and beatings. CNDH, San Isidro Report, supra note 44, at 31. According to the CNDH, the five individuals they interviewed said the soldiers were not involved in the detentions. Rather than stating the evidence was mixed or unclear, the CNDH concludes the army's behavior was "correct and respectful" from March 21-28. Id. at 29. The CNDH then finds that the individuals who said the army was not involved in the detentions on March 29 were more credible than those who said it was. For a critique of this analysis, see discussion in text accompanying note 112, infra.

As described below, Minnesota Advocates finds the army was present and facilitated the detentions, which almost certainly could not have taken place otherwise. In addition, there is considerable evidence that soldiers beat and tortured residents of San Isidro. The CNDH report cites declarations of at least six residents of San Isidro and Mitzitón who reported the direct participation of soldiers in detentions, beatings, or other acts of intimidation.⁴⁶ At least nine detainees said they were abused by either soldiers or the police.⁴⁷ Minnesota Advocates interviewed two individuals who said soldiers were directly engaged in searches and interrogations of detainees.⁴⁸ Minnesota Advocates also received reports that soldiers engaged in beatings of village residents, but Minnesota Advocates did not collect enough eyewitness accounts to determine whether this evidence is completely reliable.⁴⁹ Minnesota Advocates also received one credible account of torture by the police.⁵⁰

According to the CNDH report, the villages of San Isidro and Mitzitón

47. The CNDH report on San Isidro cites declarations by nine detainees who were beaten or threatened in a manner apparently intended to force confessions or obtain information: Fausto González Hernández, Eraso González Hernández, Carmelino González López, Hermelindo Hernández González, Lorenzo González López, Marcelino Shilón de la Cruz, Manuel Hernández González, Ciro Gómez López, Porfirio González Hernández. CNDH, San Isidro Report at 19-21. Lorenzo González said, for example, that "the military stopped him and forced him to lie face down on the ground while they kicked him in different parts of his body in order to make him confess." In addition, the CNDH cites the case of Hermelindo Hernández González, who said two men took him to where the remains of the dead soldiers had been found, and "they forced him to lie face up, and they put a stone in each foot and hand; one of the soldiers was standing on his chest" while the other hit his testicles with a stick, "threatening him to tell what happened." Id. at 20. Centro Fray Bartolomé also interviewed detainees and received reports of torture. Centro Fray Bartolomé, Boletín de Prensa (March 31, 1993). At the CNDH Mexico City office on May 27, Minnesota Advocates reviewed a videotaped interview of one other resident of San Isidro who alleges torture. The CNDH did not cite this case in its report on San Isidro. CNDH representative Efren Gonzalez Pola told Minnesota Advocates he believed this report was untrue. Minnesota Advocates could find no reason to disbelieve the allegations from its review of the videotape.

48. Interviews with Alberto Shilón and Julio Pérez Díaz.

49. Alberto Shilón de la Cruz and Mariano de la Cruz López, both of San Isidro, said relatives and friends were beaten by soldiers on March 29. Neither actually witnessed the beatings, although both reported seeing many villagers badly bruised afterwards. Rafael Heredia López of Mitzitón said that while being detained at the office of the Public Prosecutor (Ministerio Público) in San Cristóbal, he saw a number of detainees from San Isidro who were bloody and badly bruised, as if they had been recently beaten.

50. Interview with Rafael Heredia López of Mitzitón, described below.

were targeted by military investigator Hans Karl Hahne Arias on March 28.⁵¹ In addition, the CNDH report states that Hahne Arias informed the State Attorney General at 10 pm on March 28, 1993, that he had received "testimonies" identifying two individuals responsible for detaining, murdering, and incinerating the two soldiers.⁵² Hahne Arias' report identifies these individuals as "Antonio," a resident of San Isidro, and "Rafael," a resident of the nearby town of Mitzitón, who reportedly owned a sawmill near San Isidro.

Mitzitón, March 28-29, 1993

The military and police entered the village of Mitzitón late on the night of March 28-29 and detained four residents. Minnesota Advocates interviewed two of the four detainees, Rafael Heredia López, age 39, and Julio Pérez Díaz, age 16. Both Heredia López and Pérez Díaz said they were awakened by knocks on their doors late on the night of March 28. They said that non-uniformed individuals entered their homes and dragged them outside. The men did not have arrest or search warrants, nor did they show identification of any kind.

Heredia López said six non-uniformed men made him lie face down on the floor as they searched his home, strewing his possessions around and breaking ceramic pots. They found and took his 22-caliber rifle, then dragged him outside by the hair before he had a chance to dress. Once outside, he saw that 30 to 40 heavily armed soldiers had surrounded his home.

Julio Pérez Díaz said men in plain clothes entered, searched, and ransacked his home, confiscating a handsaw. They kicked him in the back and dragged him outside. There men in plain clothes held him down while a soldier interrogated him about the killing and about what he knew about San Isidro, demanding to know "what crimes I had committed."

Both Heredia López and Pérez Díaz said they were taken in a white pick-up truck, along with two other villagers, to the Rancho Nuevo military base. There they were subjected to further interrogation under bright lights that prevented them from identifying their interrogators. Julio believed they were soldiers. After a brief stop at the military base, the men were taken to the police station in San Cristóbal. Both men reported being held incommunicado for twelve hours and without food for about twenty-four hours.

Heredia López said he was alternately accused of killing the soldiers and questioned about who committed the murder. He told them he knew nothing of the murders, nor had he ever been to the village of San Isidro, six hours away by foot. The police told Heredia López that "Andrés" (a man he did not know) had told them he was the murderer. When Heredia López refused to confess, the police made him lie in a large tire with his hands tied behind his back. They tipped his head back, forced open his mouth with a piece of wood, and poured

51. CNDH, San Isidro Report, supra note 44, at 10.

52. As discussed above, Minnesota Advocates cannot state for certain that soldiers were involved in torturing residents of San Isidro. The fact that the military already collected what amounted to confessions at this time -- before it ever called in the police -- lends credence to reports that soldiers were involved in interrogating and torturing San Isidro residents.

water into his mouth, until he felt he would drown. They then placed the barrel of a rifle to the side of his head and told him to make a declaration.

After about 30 minutes' interrogation, Heredia López was taken to La Merced, an abandoned prison in San Cristóbal, along with three other men from San Isidro. They were met there by six or seven armed men in plain clothes who said they were going to kill him. Heredia López pleaded with them to get it over with quickly. Instead, they continued to interrogate him about the killing. When he failed to provide them with useful information, one man raised a gun to his head and pulled the trigger. The gun was not loaded.

Heredia López was held in a cell at La Merced for two to three hours, then returned to the Prosecutor's office. Both Pérez Díaz and Heredia López were held on Monday night, March 29, and released on Tuesday, March 30. Heredia López reported seeing a number of other detainees at the Prosecutor's office (in the same building as the police station and jail), who appeared to have been badly beaten. Heredia López and Pérez Díaz each said they made a statement saying they knew no one at San Isidro and had no involvement in the killing. All four detainees were released on March 30 without charges.

San Isidro, March 28-29, 1993

Minnesota Advocates interviewed Alberto Shilón de la Cruz, a resident of San Isidro, who was present on Sunday, March 28, when the army announced it had found the remains of the dead soldiers. He said hundreds of troops searching for the missing soldiers had camped in and around San Isidro without incident. After discovery of the remains on March 28, however, the soldiers began interrogating and threatening inhabitants. He estimated there were about 400 soldiers in San Isidro with at least 30 military vehicles.

Shilón said that on Monday, March 29, a small number of plainclothesmen joined the 400 soldiers in San Isidro, searched homes, and continued to interrogate residents. Minnesota Advocates reviewed several other reports collected by the Centro Fray Bartolomé and the CNDH stating that soldiers and police beat and threatened residents of San Isidro at this time.⁵³

At 6 am on March 29, Shilón saw three persons being taken away in military vehicles (Erasmus González Hernández, Fausto González Hernández, and Carmelino González López). All three were returned to San Isidro at 10 am. Later that day, Shilón witnessed several other persons being detained and taken from the village.

A total of nine men from San Isidro and the surrounding villages, as well as the four from Mitzitón, were detained by the State Judicial Police without warrants on March 29.⁵⁴ Some of the detainees were held by the police for about 24 hours on March 29 before being turned over to the Public Prosecutor (Ministerio Público).⁵⁵ During this time, three detainees from San Isidro and one from Mitzitón (Rafael Heredia López) were taken to an abandoned prison, interrogated and tortured.⁵⁶

San Isidro, April 25, 1993

Minnesota Advocates interviewed Shilón and Mariano de la Cruz López, also a resident of San Isidro, who were present when some 200 police returned to San Isidro on April 25. Most were Security Police in blue uniform, but they were accompanied by men in plain clothes claiming to be Judicial Police. Neither Shilón nor de la Cruz saw the police present any official identification, let alone search or arrest warrants.

Shilón and de la Cruz told similar stories of being detained by police and tortured. Each was kicked and beaten with guns while being interrogated about the killing. They were then taken to the hill behind the basketball court in the center of town. While flat on their backs, they had their mouths forced open, cloths placed over their heads, and 20-liter containers of water were poured over their faces. De la Cruz said the water filled his nose and mouth, and he believed he would die. He was then pulled up, interrogated again, and the process repeated. Both men said they were submitted to this treatment three times. Shilón's 17-year-old son Luis was also tortured.

Police also searched and ransacked homes. De la Cruz said they stole one million pesos, three land deeds, and his birth certificate from his home. Shilón said they removed two land deeds, as well as his and his childrens' birth certificates. They both reported that many other villagers also had their homes ransacked and their land deeds stolen.⁵⁷

About seventeen persons were detained by the police in San Isidro on April 25, 1993, and taken to the Public Prosecutor's office in San Cristóbal.⁵⁸ Minnesota Advocates has not determined what the legal basis for the detentions may have been.⁵⁹ The seventeen were from San Isidro and the neighboring villages of San Antonio el Porvenir, Manzanillo, Betania, el Chivero, as well as from Ejido Flores Magón.⁶⁰ Some of the detainees were turned over to the Federal Judicial Police and charged with possession of weapons prohibited by Federal law. The Federal authorities released them immediately, finding the arms did not violate federal law.⁶¹ The newspaper La Jornada reports that on April 25, four Tzotzil Indians were detained for stockpiling arms,⁶² and that the four were subsequently released because authorities concluded the collection of arms confiscated was not large enough to constitute a stockpile.⁶³

San Isidro, May 8, 1993

On May 8, a contingent of some 200 to 400 police returned to San Isidro for a third time. A witness told Minnesota Advocates he counted 47 vehicles carrying policemen driving up the hill to San Isidro.⁶⁴ Upon arrival, the police reportedly found the town had been deserted. According to the Centro Fray Bartolomé, police confiscated axes, machetes, hand saws, hammers, lamps, and one million old pesos that had been left behind.⁶⁵

The Minnesota Advocates fact-finding team visited San Isidro on May 25, 1993, and found the town still entirely deserted. Former San Isidro resident Alberto Shilón de la Cruz told Minnesota Advocates that the population had left for fear of further detentions by the military and police. The residents continue to live in the area, he said, and intend to return once they feel certain the police and military will not return.

Ocosingo Incidents

Late on May 24, the Minnesota Advocates fact-finding team in Chiápas received reports of military action on several small villages in the region of Ocosingo. When the team arrived in the village of Pataté Nuevo on the evening of May 25, it found it deserted except for about fifty women and children and a few men gathered in the central church. The individuals in the church -- many of whom had fled their homes in the nearby town of Pataté Viejo -- said hundreds of soldiers had descended on villages in the area the day before. They were afraid to return home as long as the soldiers remained.

According to the refugees in the church, Pataté residents heard shots fired in the hills in the early morning of May 24. At about 9 am, hundreds of soldiers (some residents reported a thousand)⁶⁶ descended on Pataté Viejo. Between 10 am and noon, the entire population of the village (over a hundred individuals) was held on a basketball court in the center of town.⁶⁷ Women were forced to open their homes to the soldiers, who methodically searched the premises. Several villagers reported looting by soldiers.⁶⁸

Many of the residents were accused of harboring guerrillas. According to members of the Pataté community, soldiers carried away eight men from among those gathered on the basketball court, after finding guns or knives in their homes. Yet, according to the villagers, nothing larger than a 22-caliber rifle, legal under Mexican law, was found in the village.

Residents of Pataté reported being misled by the soldiers about the detentions. The wife of one detainee said she was told by soldiers that her husband would be returned after fifteen minutes of questioning. As of 10 pm on May 25, none of those interviewed by Minnesota Advocates had been informed of the whereabouts of their husbands.

Villagers informed Minnesota Advocates of a large encampment of soldiers at the "Nazeret I" Pemex plant on a hill just outside town. The fact-finding team went to investigate and encountered a large force of soldiers (between 300 and 1000 soldiers, more than 22 personnel carriers, and several large trucks).⁶⁹ After asking for General Gastón Menchaca Arias, commander of the 31st Military Zone, the fact-finding team was met by a group of high level military officers, including General Menchaca and his superior, General Miguel Angel Godínez Bravo, commander of the 7th Military Region of Mexico. At least one other general of Menchaca's rank was present.

General Godínez confirmed that soldiers under his command detained not eight but ten civilians in the region (Minnesota Advocates later learned the army detained two Guatemalan men in another part of Ocosingo). He said they had been caught in "flagrante delicto" (in the act of committing a crime)⁷⁰ for possession of illegal weapons. General Menchaca said the detainees had been turned over to federal authorities.

General Godínez would provide no more information to Minnesota
